THE LONG & SHORT OF IT

"WHY so gloomy, chum?" Laurie turned sharply at the question. Behind her walked Maggie Grant, and she was certainly glad to see her best friend at a time like this.

"Two guesses, Maggie," she replied, slowing to walk beside the other girl.

"Last year's dress has to do for this year's Prom?"

"Worse. NO PROM! Jerry's going to be out of town for the weekend, so he can't take me, all the boys in school are already dated up, and nobody, but nobody seems to have a brother over six years old. What a situation." Laurie moaned, sympathizing greatly with herself.

"How about cousins, even uncles? None at all?" Maggie asked hopefully.

"You know my cousins . . . when will you get around to great - grandfathers?" Laurie sighed. "Let's face it . . . my case is hopeless. When the Prom was announced, I turned down a dozen dates for the night because I thought Mom and Dad were taking me to the country for the weekend, but now that their plans are changed, we're not going, and it's too late for a Prom date."

"Say, I might have a solution, chum," Maggie began.

". . . please, no roommates. I got stuck once before. If you're going to suggest that your Tom get a date for me from college, it's thumbs down. I don't want to be surprised."

"Well, I won't surprise you, then. I'll be perfectly frank. Tom always talks about Harold Roundplum. He's got a perfectly ridiculous name, he's terribly short, and I'm hiding no facts from you."

"Look, Maggie, I'm 5'6" tall. Wouldn't I look grand making my entrance at the dance with HAROLD ROUNDPLUM? As if his name weren't silly enough."

"Alright, cookie . . . but it'll look even worse if you stay home, and at least, if you get a date with Harold, you'll get to the Prom, and be able to dance with some of the other boys every so often. Still it's better than sitting home and dancing with a broomstick."

Laurie began to think. "W-well, you're probably perfectly right. I won't have to stick around with Harold all night. I guess he's used to that. Okay, Maggie, you can arrange it."

The subject closed, they turned to talk of gowns and hair, although Harold Roundplum was in back of Laurie's wary mind.

"Harold Roundplum . . . Harold Plumhound . . . Plumley Roundground . . . Plumround Houndgrind . . oh, PHOOEY." Laurie thought as she turned into her house a few minutes later. "Probably everyone just calls him . . . (gulp) . . . 'Shorty'."

But, things had to be made the best of, and Laurie was really glad she was going with Tom's roommate. She would just make sure not to stick around him all night, so that all the other girls wouldn't be able to tease her too much the next day.

"Something's just got to be done with my hair," Laurie complained as she walked into the beauty parlor the following afternoon. "Millie," she said to the operator, "I'm going out with a very short boy . . . give me a hairdo that will flatten my head a little." She sat primly in one of the plastic-covered chairs and tried not to notice the giggles she heard.

After an hour and a half in the beauty parlor, discussing her problem with Millie, Laurie made her exit.

She patted her new hairdo approvingly as she gazed into a store window, then she headed for Harkin's Dress Shop.

"Stripes, stripes going THIS way," Laurie said, indicating her wish with horizontal sweeps of her finger across her shoulders, waist and hips.

She selected three gowns, and tried each of them on while the amused salesgirl looked on wonderingly.

"That's lovely on you," the salesgirl offered.

"It SMELLS! It makes me look like a beanpole. I've got to look short. I don't care if I look dumpy, as long as I look short. Hand me the taffeta one with the pink and grey stripes, please."

She admired herself in the three way mirror. "Yes this is what I want. Please send it to Miss Laura Townson, 342 Garden Lane. You can charge it to my father, Ralph Townson."

"Now, shoes," Laurie whispered to herself as she walked out of the dress shop. "Perfectly flat sandals." Soon she had completed her outfit, and was happy that she didn't have to date short boys every weekend. High-heels were so grown-up.

She didn't dress with much enthusiasm the night of the dance. Maggie had come over earlier, and was dressing with her, since both boys were going to pick them up at Laurie's house. At eight-thirty, the front door-bell rang, and the two girls, dressed by now, walked down carefully, Laurie a little hesitantly. When she saw Harold Roundplum standing at the foot of the staircase, she sighed. Yes, he certainly looked like anyone named Harold Roundplum should look.

The short, 180 pound boy bent over in a bow. "Milady, your carriage awaits you."

"Why, he's certainly polite!" Laurie thought as he tucked her wrap around her shoulders.

The foursome left Laurie's house and headed for the car parked at the curb. Laurie began to howl when she saw the miniature foreign car, and she looked at Harold doubtingly.

"A-HA," he shouted, "Methinks you-thinks this rounded body will never squeeze into yonder vehicle." Harold opened the door, and after Tom, Maggie and Laurie were seated, he practically bounced around the back of the car and opened his door. He surveyed the situation, took a deep breath, and his chest swelled, and his face blown up, he held his breath and proceeded to enter the little car. He puffed and squeezed, huffed and puffed, and finally, as he got into the driver's seat, he made a strange sound. It was something like "Ker-POP!"

"You see, I made it!" he winked to the laughing Laurie. She broke out in uncontrollable laughter as Harold withdrew from inside his pocket a miniature fire-cracker, which had made the noise. As the car rolled away, the sound of laughter filled the street.

Laurie was amazed at Harold Roundplum's ability to dance. He waltzed like a dream, he lindied like a veteran, and his tango was the center of attraction at one point in the evening. At first Laurie felt pretty silly dancing with the little round boy, but when in the middle of the tango she discovered everyone else had stopped dancing and was standing about watching her and Harold. They were laughing, but it was good-natured laughter, and Harold was apparently having the time of his life. Laurie laughed with the rest and began to enjoy herself.

Before the evening was half over, the girls were crowding around Harold, and had cornered him begging to dance. But he waved them away jovially, winked at Laurie who who stood in the center of the room feeling very lost, bounced across the floor while everyone screamed in laughter, and proceeded to carry Laurie around in a rousing Viennese Waltz, which struck everyone pretty funny, as the orchestra was playing a Rhumba.

"Why he's so cute, I'd like to wrap him in blue paper and tie him with a gay bow," Laurie sighed after the boys had left them at her door.

Maggie saw the faint, dreamy sigh on Laurie's lips, and she asked innocently, "Why, what are you talking about?"

"Oh, you know . . . that thing about nicest things coming in small packages . . . can't you just see Harold Roundplum tied in a blue ribbon?"

The two friends walked inside and closed the door, stifling their laughter so they wouldn't wake Laurie's sleeping family.
